Florence Nightingale (middle) in 1886, with her graduating class of nurses from St Thomas' outside Claydon House, Buckinghamshire, photo credit The long-lasting legacy she left is illustrated through the Nightingale Pledge; taken by new nurses, this is a kind of modified version of the Hippocratic Oath. Nightingale went on to set up the standards of nursing that are still in place today, she ensured that the hospital was as clean as it possibly could be and introduced sanitary improvements such as hand washing. At night she patrolled the wards with her lamp, ministering to each patient in turn. Science Museum Group Collection Plate from The Illustrated London News, 24 February 1855, showing Nightingale at work. Florence Nightingale and her nurses saw soldiers suffering from frostbite, dysentery, cholera and typhus living in 'utterly chaotic, unsanitary and inhumane living conditions'.
